LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

BELLES OF THE KITCHEN! o the Editors of the Appeal; I have tried to make plain rules for the successful and highly profitable silk culture in the South, and as simple as words can express them, so as they could be thoroughly understood, and could be easily followed by the masses of the Southern people. But it seems that some do not yet fully understand about the kind of food, and how to feed it for profitable silk-raising, so I clip the part of my lecture on "Practical Silk Culture in the South," about food for silk worms, and insert it just as it was first printed in the Ap-WEDNESDAY ... The traditional food of the slikworn is the mul-carry tree leaves. The white mulberry tree (m. 160) and the essge orange marks the finest quality of slik coccons. Those who use the coage range leaves for slikworm food must however, ear in mind that the shoots from a bedgerow be-

The cultivation of the cauge orange [machan marcatico] is so well understood in this country that there is no need of giving detailed instructions on the subject. Very generally used as a hedge-plant in those sections of the country which are particularly adapted to sik culture, its leaves may at once be obtained without any special investment of capital. Indeed, as the hedges need trimming, the culting off of the new year's growth, as the leaves may be wanted for feeding purposes, is a saving rather than an expenditure. Those who use this plant as sikworm food must, however, remember that the shoots from a hedgerow become very vigorous and succulent by the time the worms are in the last age (one week). These more milky and succulent terminal leaves should be thrown saide and not used. In avoiding the more tender leaves and using only the eider and firare leaves, especially when the worms are large, consists the "whole secret" of the successful rearing of slik-worms on this plant. And if care be had in this respect there will be no appreciable difference in the slik crop from osage orange leaves, compared with that from the mulberry. Mardi-Gras, Feb. 21st. who have certain kinds of mulberry trees for sale at a high price do not like to talk much about the osage orange favorably as food for the silkworm. The people are interested to know what is the cheapest, and at the same time as good as the costliest tree for the purpose of raising fine silk. Now, as to the sale of silk cocoons raised on osage orange, when fed properly, there need not be the slightest he-itancy. Not only will they find ready sale in Memphis, but in Philadelphia, Paterson, New Jersey, New York, and also in Marseilles and Lyons, France, and many other places. to Give a Bond of $1250. In the Chancery Court Chancellor Mc-Dowell yesterday disposed of the motions argued on last Saturday in the case of B. Lowenstein & Bros. sgainst C. Mundinger in an oral opinion, without directly deciding upon the questions raised by counsel. The chancellor held that if the defendant, Mundinger, would give a bond in the sum of $1250 that the store at No. 201 Main street, which was in custody in the suit, should be released. The condition of the bond required is to succeed, the amount of their recovery to the extent of the bond. The decision of the court involved only a preliminary question, and we suppose the matter will rest until the suit is regularly tried. The case in the Chancery Court has no direct connection with the criminal presentation resulting. with the criminal prosecution pending against Mundinger, and to be tried to-day before Esquire Coleman. The litigation in the Chancery Court involves the question whether the plaintiff's money was in-wested in Mundinger's store. The criminal cases are directed to the inquiry of Mundinger's guilt of the offenses and crimes of embezzlement, etc. The matter has at-tracted public attention and elicited the in-terest of the neonle. The Memphis Club Entertainment. To the Editors of the Appeal: especially silk. The culture of silk is better adapted to home industry than any other branch of work which opens as large a field in the commercial market, it being valuable as a commodity and largely in demand. It particularly commends itself to the women and children of the rural districts, as well as towns and cities, as an occupation of an intelligent and moral bearing, not requiring constant duty, but enabling the parties to pursue their household duties. I invite the cordial co-operation of all those who desire to see our country retaining within her own borders the large amount of money that now goes to foreign markets for raw silk. I earnestly urge the agricultural people and independence. The introduction of slavery brought about a change in the nature of pronearly everybody has seen at some time or other; but few have seen it so refreshingly presented as it is by the Vokes, Mr. Fred Vokes, as "Cousin Joe." was excel-lent. He looked as if he might just have arrived from the mountains of Tennessee and Kentucky, so true to life was he. Miss Victoria Vokes was hardly behind her brother in provoking mirth. She is a very lithe, vivacious little woman, and lends a spice to everything she does. She sings fairly well and dances like a fairy. These two were the life of the farce. Belles of the Kitchen is an extraragram which resembles the Brook and Photosin its charecter. It teems with nonsense and fun, but it is not near so good as the Brook. Although the Vokes family have played it for years, there is no evidence of enaul in the way they carry it. The Troubadours always seemed to be bored to death.
